

ARBITRABILITY: THE LIMITS OF ARBITRATION

The foundation of arbitration lies in the agreement of parties to arbitrate. Party autonomy is often invoked as a guiding principle. Nonetheless, there are instances where a dispute just cannot be decided by a private tribunal, whatever the parties say. It is accepted that the validity of an arbitration agreement, and the enforceability of an arbitral award, are subject to the concept of arbitrability. Yet, arbitrability is an evolving concept, the contents of which vary from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, and even change over time. This talk explores the idea of subjective and objective arbitrability. It also looks at the constraints of arbitrating difficult subject matter such as insolvency, oppression of minority shareholders and trust disputes.
